STATE OF MAINE
KENNEBEC, ss.

SUPERIOR COURT
CIVIL ACTION
DOCKET NO. CV-22-054

ANDREW ROBBINS, et al.,

Plaintiffs,

v.

JAMES BILLINGS, in his official capacity as Executive Director of the Maine Commission on Indigent Legal Services; JOSHUA TARDY, in his official capacity as Chair of the Maine Commission on Indigent Legal Services; DONALD ALEXANDER, RANDALL BATES, MICHAEL CAREY, ROGER KATZ, KIMBERLY MONAGHAN, and DAVID SOUCY, in their official capacities as Commissioners of the Maine Commission on Indigent Legal Services; and the STATE OF MAINE, Defendants.

ORDER AFTER PHASE ONE TRIAL (COUNTS I, III, AND V)

On January 22–24, 2025, the Court held a bench trial on the issues remaining for resolution in Counts I, III and V in this Phase I litigation. The trial was conducted pursuant to the Court's January 3, 2025 Combined Order on Partially Dispositive Motions. In that Order, the Court granted partial summary judgment on the issue of liability in favor of the Plaintiff Subclass members on Count I; granted full summary judgment in favor of the MCPDS Defendants on Count II; granted partial summary judgment on the issue of liability under the Sixth Amendment in favor of Plaintiff Subclass members on Count III; and deferred ruling on the State of Maine's Motion for Summary Judgment on Count V.[1]

[1] On February 21, 2025, the Court ruled on two pending motions brought by MCPDS Defendants. The Court granted in part and denied in part a Motion to Alter or Amend Combined Order on Partially Dispositive Motions and denied a Motion for Partial Summary Judgment on Relief Demanded in Counts I and II.

The Court has reviewed the extensive post-trial filings by the parties on these Counts, the last of which was received by the Court on February 28, 2025. The Court begins by making findings of fact upon which it will in part rely when considering the remedy issues for the Section 1983 claim in Count I, as well as for the claim for habeas corpus relief in Count III.[2]

FACTUAL FINDINGS

The scope of the problem at the close of the evidence

As of January 9, 2025, there were approximately 739 pending criminal cases in Maine where no counsel had ever been provided by the MCPDS Defendants. O'Brien Testimony, Jan. 23, 2025, at 64–72.[3] This was the credible conclusion of the Plaintiffs' expert, Dr. Liam O'Brien, a highly qualified Professor of Statistics at Colby College. Of those cases, about one half of them remained without assigned counsel for more than 66 days. Id. at 67. Professor O'Brien conducted this analysis using data provided to Plaintiffs by the MCPDS Defendants for three points in time: September of 2024, November of 2024, and January of 2025. Id. at 44. He concluded that the median time that cases are going without counsel has increased from September 2024 to January 2025. Id. at 76–77.[4]

In this same time frame, Professor O'Brien identified an additional distinct group of 252 cases in which counsel had been assigned but later withdrew, and no new attorney had been

[2] The Court overrules the State of Maine's standing objection to the Court considering any facts developed in the three-day bench trial in its decision on the habeas claim in Count III. The Court is unpersuaded that factual findings play no meaningful role in the Court's consideration of the scope of the remedy available in habeas claims, in addition to determinations of liability in such claims. See, e.g., Peterson v. Johnson, SJC-23-02, at 4–11 (Jan. 12, 2024) (Douglas, J.) (Findings of Fact).

[3] Please note: both the Court and the parties produced transcripts of the audio recording of the January 22–24, 2025 trial. The two transcriptions were paginated differently, and thus citations to the record using one transcript do not line up with the other transcript. When citing to the record in this Order, the Court is referring to the Court's official transcription, not the transcription ordered privately by the parties.

[4] Professor O'Brien calculated the median number of days these 739 cases have gone without counsel in two different ways. When calculated from the date the motion for appointment of counsel was granted, the median number was 66 days. Id. at 57. However, if calculated from the date the case was filed, the median number for cases for which counsel was not assigned rose to 111 days for that same group of 739 cases. Id. at 71.

assigned. Id. at 63. This brings the number of cases without counsel to 991 as of January 9, 2025. Id. at 73. And just as with the other group of 739 cases, the trend for this distinct group of 252 cases is that "the median is increasing throughout time. So at each time point, it's getting larger." Id. at 77.

Professor O'Brien also noted that, in a number of these cases, the defendant has been without counsel for more than a year. As of January 9, 2025: (1) of the cases in which a defendant's motion for counsel was granted or appointment was ordered by a court, but no counsel has been appointed, and in cases where a defendant has requested counsel but a court has not yet ruled on that motion, there are a total of 51 cases in which a defendant has been without counsel for more than a year, id. at 64–67; (2) of the cases in which a defendant previously had counsel but that counsel withdrew and no new attorney has been assigned, there are a total of 79 cases in which a defendant has been without counsel for more than a year. Id. at 74–75.

MCPDS Defendants' response to the crisis

Against this background, the MCPDS Defendants attribute the crisis to forces outside their control. They argue that the number of private attorneys participating in their programs is insufficient to carry 70 percent of adult criminal cases. Pls.' Ex. 7, Annual Report of Commission (Jan. 14, 2025), at 3. That percentage was selected by MCPDS as part of its goal to create a "hybrid" indigent defense system. Under this model, public defender offices are expected to staff the remaining 30 percent of the criminal cases requiring assignment of counsel for adult indigent defendants. Id.

In its Report, MCPDS adamantly defends its caseload standards (often referred to as the "Chapter 4" standards or regulations)—the points-based limits MCPDS puts on how many cases a rostered attorney can take in a single year. It asserts that "[t]he idea that PDS standards are too high and are driving people away is simply not supported." Id. They note that the trend of declining participation has been ongoing for "a period of years," with the exception of an uptick in 2024. Id. Earlier in the crisis, in a March 8, 2024 memo from Executive Director Billings to the Commissioners, he made essentially the same claim. MCPDS Defs.' Ex. 13, Memorandum Regarding Unassigned Cases and System Capacity (Mar. 8, 2024). Executive Director Billings stated that, as of that date, there were over 20,000 unallocated "points" in the system, id. at 1, and that "for all attorneys not already over their caseload limit, the average carried caseload was 85 points less than their caseload limit." Id. He drew the following conclusion from the data:

> It has been suggested that the implementation of Chapter 4 was the precursor to the rise in the number of cases needing counsel. However, looking at the number of cases without counsel over time reveals that the number of unstaffed cases has been steadily increasing since November of 2023. That rate held steady in January of 2024 after the implementation of the Chapter 4 caseload standards. The current accelerated rate of increase did not begin until mid to late February of 2024. The temporal delay and availability of system capacity indicate that the rise in cases without counsel cannot be ascribed to the implementation of Chapter 4.

Id. at 2. He explained that since the Chapter 4 regulations were implemented, "26 attorneys have been granted caseload limit waivers. 19 attorneys have been granted waivers that would allow them to exceed the standard caseload limit of 270 points." Id. at 1. He ended the memo by stating that MCPDS staff concluded that "counsel appear to be self-regulating their caseloads and intentionally maintaining lower caseloads than the maximums permitted by Chapter 4." Id. at 3. In other words, he believes the caseload standards are working to the benefit of the system as it motivates private attorneys to stay on the rosters if they can control their caseloads.

He indicated at trial, however, that since the Court's finding of liability on Count I, that he had been "freely granting" waivers. Billings Testimony, Jan. 23, 2025, at 220–21.[5]

[5] In its most recent Annual Report, MCPDS Executive Director Billings wrote that MCPDS undertook emergency rulemaking in July 2024. Pls.' Ex. 7, Annual Report of Commission (Jan. 14, 2025), at 3. These rules made it possible for attorneys to seek waivers for "specialized panels." Id. Executive Director Billings noted that only one

The MCPDS Report concludes that the caseload standards should be maintained, and that "the best way forward to address this crisis is to: (a) continue the buildout of the public defender offices to geographically cover the remainder of the state, (b) increase to at least a 50% public defender-private counsel ratio, and (c) continue with recruitment efforts at the law school level—both in Maine and elsewhere." Pls.' Ex. 7, Annual Report of Commission (Jan. 14, 2025), at 3–4.

There is unrebutted testimony in the record, however, that the approach taken to date by MCPDS for how to use the expertise and experience within the public defender offices (the District Defenders) has fallen short in addressing the crisis in four of the five regions where offices now exist, with one notable exception in Region IV, where the Capital Region Public Defender opened in late 2023. In response to questions from the Court, it was established that some of the District Defenders in the other four regions are not actually assigning cases to themselves but are instead supervising Assistant Defenders in cases selected for them by the District Defenders.

District Defenders were presumably hired because they are experienced and highly competent attorneys qualified to handle any case type. And it is well understood that one major benefit of a public defender system is that public defenders are not typically given the option to pick and choose their cases. But that is what appears to be happening now. The Court understands that four of the five public defender offices open now are relatively new. And in ordinary circumstances, the decision to roll out the offices while permitting District Defenders to personally handle very few or, in some cases, no, adult criminal matters might be completely defensible. But current circumstances are far from ordinary.

attorney applied for a waiver, and he cites this fact as further evidence that the standards should not be changed or adjusted during this crisis. Id. The waivers are intended to permit attorneys to exceed the number of points MCPDS permits attorneys to accrue before they must notify courts and MCPDS that they are no longer eligible to be assigned to represent defendants for certain case types. Billings Testimony, Jan. 23, 2025, at 219–20.

Executive Director Billings testified that he is hearing from his District Defenders that > a lot of the cases on the unrepresented list are there because nobody wants them, and the evidence is in disarray, the discovery is incomplete, there's an ongoing battle for discovery, and that it takes a long time to get caught up because you feel like you are behind in those case. And so there's a limit to how quickly they can take cases off the list and still provide high-quality services.

Billings Testimony, Jan. 23, 2025, at 240.

Cases that are in disarray are exactly what might be expected when cases linger without representation by a skilled practitioner who could resolve or ameliorate what the District Defenders describe. And it would seem obvious that these cases are exactly the sorts of cases that the District Defenders should personally be taking on—particularly for defendants in custody.

Here are the numbers of cases that have been selected by four out of the five District Defenders (DDs) for assignment to their Assistant Defenders (ADs), and to themselves:

1) The Aroostook County DD personally handles no adult criminal cases of his own. Instead, he handles "a few juvenile cases" and acts as "Lawyer of the Day" (LOD) in Fort Kent and sometimes in Madawaska. He supervises two ADs who each have 70–75 cases. Billings Testimony, Jan. 24, 2025, at 8–11;

2) In the Highlands Region of Penobscot and Piscataquis Counties, the DD personally handles no adult criminal cases of her own. Instead, she supervises one AD who has 11 cases, and one AD who has 20 cases. id. at 7–8;

3) In the Downeast Region of Hancock and Washington Counties, the DD has 14 cases of his own, two of which are on deferred dispositions. As of the close of the evidence, he had no ADs to supervise. id. at 8;

4) In the Tri-County Region of Androscoggin, Franklin, and Oxford Counties, the DD personally handles 13 adult criminal cases. He supervises one AD who, as of January 24, 2025, had 2 cases (but who he hoped would be able to take 12 to 15 more cases in the near future); one AD who has 12 cases; one AD who has 24 cases; and one AD who has 40 cases. He also supervises one AD who, as of the close of the evidence, did not have any cases assigned to him. Tarpinian Testimony, Jan. 24, 2025, at 74–77.

MCPDS is understandably concerned with the Assistant Defenders being "overwhelmed" if they have to take too many cases while they are still being trained. However, no MCPDS representative has articulated a credible reason why the District Defenders themselves cannot take "off the spreadsheet" the most difficult cases, meaning either that the case or defendant may be particularly challenging—especially when those defendants are in custody. To put it in simple, mathematical terms, if each District Defender personally handled approximately ten unrepresented defendants who are now in custody, the "in custody" column on the spreadsheet would be cut in half.

The testimony at trial also establishes that no one from MCPDS' central office is maintaining an internal list of the unrepresented, incarcerated defendants or where they are located—much less attempting to actually visit them in the jails. Instead, they wait to receive the data from the Judicial Branch, and then forward that data three times per week to "all eligible counsel." Maciag Testimony, Jan. 23, 2025, at 183–85. Deputy Director Maciag and Executive Director Billings explained that MCPDS does not have the staff to make calls or otherwise reach out to private counsel to take adult criminal cases and often rely upon court clerks to make such calls. Billings Testimony, Jan. 23, 2025, at 198–99. He did note, however, that MCPDS recently conducted a pilot program to recruit private attorneys to represent parents in child protective cases. Id. at 254. A private attorney was hired to work with the Lewiston District Court clerks to make calls to find counsel willing to be assigned. Id. He stated that her success rate was approximately sixty percent. Id. He did not indicate if MCPDS was considering using this model to try and similarly convince private attorneys to take criminal cases off the unrepresented list.

In his oral closing argument, Counsel for MCPDS suggested to the Court that their proposal for a remedy to the ongoing Sixth Amendment violations found in Count I was essentially the budget they had proposed be included in the Governor's budget for the next biennium, MCPDS Defendants' Closing Argument, Jan. 24, 2025, at 116, which means that MCPDS is addressing the current crisis by focusing on obtaining additional resources.

Executive Director Billings testified about the budget MCPDS submitted for consideration by the Governor. Billings Testimony, Jan. 23, 2025, at 249–59. Because an insufficient number of private attorneys are willing to take cases, the proposed budget would permit MCPDS to roll out three more public defender offices: one in the Midcoast, and two in the most populated counties in Maine, Cumberland and York. Billings Testimony, Jan. 23, 2025, at 251; Pls.' Ex. 7, Annual Report of Commission (Jan. 14, 2025), at 9, 15. Their goal is for public defender offices statewide to take on 50 percent of adult criminal cases, as opposed to the 30 percent of adult criminal cases they are supposed to be handling now. Billings Testimony, Jan. 23, 2025, at 255; Pls.' Ex. 7, Annual Report of Commission (Jan. 14, 2025), at 15. Their budget included financial incentives for private attorneys to take more cases, along with the creation of three new positions tasked specifically with soliciting private attorneys to take cases "off" the unrepresented list. Billings Testimony, Jan. 23, 2025, at 251–52. The proposal was modeled after the State of Oregon, which has faced similar problems to Maine in providing counsel for indigent defendants. Id. at 244–45.

Unfortunately, to date, MCPDS has been unable to persuade other State actors in the Legislative or Executive Branches to go along with this proposal. According to Executive Director Billings, "[t]he next word we saw was in the release of the Governor's budget, where we had no new positions and we do not have the $12 million that we need to pay the rostered attorneys." Id. at 257.

The parties are aware that the Court has no authority to order the Legislature to appropriate the funds requested by MCPDS. And the Court would emphasize that it has no intention of ordering any particular District Defender to take a particular case. Nor does it have authority at this stage of the litigation to order MCPDS to consider suspending caseload standards or to implement a pilot program such as the one that was so successful in finding attorneys for parents in child protective cases. The Court's purpose in asking about capacity was not part of an agenda to micromanage MCPDS. The Court's questions were designed to determine if there was as a factual matter some reserve capacity in the system. It appears to the Court that there is.

The factual findings about these issues are manifest from the trial record, and some of them they will play a part in the legal analysis conducted by the Court on the Counts remaining in this litigation.

COUNT I

The Phase I Subclass of unrepresented Plaintiffs (hereinafter, "the Plaintiffs") prevailed on the issue of liability under Count I, the Section 1983 claim. The Court found that the Sixth Amendment requires MCPDS Defendants to provide Plaintiffs with continuous representation from the time the right attaches at a defendant's first appearance or arraignment, throughout pretrial events and proceedings, and throughout the plea-bargaining and trial processes.

Plaintiffs now seek a declaratory judgment consistent with those conclusions, and a permanent injunction requiring the MCPDS Defendants to provide continuous representation.

In order to obtain permanent injunctive relief, Plaintiffs must succeed on the merits; and they must establish that 1) they would suffer irreparable harm if the injunction is not issued; 2) the harm to the Plaintiffs outweighs any potential harm to the Defendants; and 3) there are public interests beyond the private interests of the Plaintiffs that would be served by issuance of the injunction. Ingraham v. Univ. of Me. at Orono, 441 A.2d 691, 693 (Me. 1982); Fitzpatrick v. Town of Falmouth, 2005 ME 97, ¶ 18, 879 A.2d 21. "Failure to demonstrate that any one of three criteria are met requires that injunctive relief be denied." All. for Retired Ams. v. Sec'y of State, 2020 ME 123, ¶ 11, 240 A.3d 45. The most critical factor independent of success on the merits is the demonstration of irreparable harm. Nken v. Holder, 556 U.S. 418, 434 (2009).

Before addressing whether Plaintiffs have established these three criteria, the Court must address a legal issue, raised for the first time by the MCPDS Defendants almost two years after this litigation commenced—that the MCPDS Defendants are entitled to "quasi-judicial immunity" and that therefore Plaintiffs are not entitled to any injunctive relief, as a matter of law.

In support of their argument, the MCPDS Defendants rely upon cases primarily from jurisdictions that take markedly different approaches than Maine as to how separate branches of government manage the authority and responsibility allocated to them to run indigent defense systems. Remarkably, after many months of asserting that the Judicial Branch has no authority over how MCPDS operates, in part because only MCPDS can determine what attorneys are qualified or eligible to be appointed, MCPDS now asserts they are protected from being subjected to injunctive relief by judicial or quasi-judicial immunity because all they do is "facilitate" the work of the courts. In order to make that argument, the MCPDS Defendants must now characterize their role differently. They now describe their obligation to provide counsel to indigent defendants as working under the courts, and as essentially ministerial. The Court rejects this argument for a number of reasons.

As noted, the MCPDS Defendants have repeatedly claimed that jurists in Maine have no authority to determine whether an attorney is qualified or eligible to be appointed. They cite to the "Clifford Commission," which in 1999 "recommend[ed] that Maine implement an indigent legal services system that is independent from the judiciary, and that provides the training and oversight necessary to ensure quality representation to Maine's citizens." MCPDS Defs.' Ex. 9, Clifford Commission Report, at 10. The Report was admitted into evidence as a Defense Exhibit, and it is also posted on the MCPDS website. See Maciag Testimony, Jan. 23, 2025, at 132–36; see also Report of the Indigent Legal Services Commission, at 10 (Feb. 2009), https://www.maine.gov/pds/sites/maine.gov.mcils/files/documents/Clifford-Commission-Report.pdf.

The Clifford Commission specifically recommended that the Maine Legislature create a new state agency, outside of the Judicial Branch and with its own budget, and that it be given the exclusive authority to set its own standards for "the selection, training, and performance review of appointed counsel." MCPDS Defs.' Ex. 9, Clifford Commission Report, at 11.

In 1999, in response to this Report, the Maine Legislature did just that. It specifically removed from the Judicial Branch the authority to make determinations as to which attorneys were qualified or eligible to represent indigent defendants. Maine jurists still retained the authority and obligation to determine indigency, M.R.U. Crim. P. 44A, and to appoint counsel, M.R.U. Crim. P. 44, but only from rosters populated by attorneys MCPDS deemed qualified. 4 M.R.S. § 1804(2)–(3) (It is explicitly the "duty" of MCPDS to "determin[e] . . . whether an attorney meets the minimum eligibility requirements to receive assignments or to receive assignments in specialized case types," to "ensure an adequate pool of qualified attorneys," and to "ensure the delivery of high-quality, effective and efficient indigent legal services."). When read in tandem with Rule 44 of the Maine Rules of Criminal Procedure, this is abundantly clear. "Assigned counsel must be designated by [MCPDS] as eligible to receive assignments for the type of case to which counsel is assigned." M.R. Crim. P. 44(a)(1) (emphasis added). And notably, under certain circumstances, the Commission has authority, pursuant to procedures they established, to "accept the initial assignment made by the court or substitute other counsel for counsel assigned by the court." Id.

The Law Court recently had occasion to review an administrative appeal brought by an attorney who claimed he was aggrieved by action taken by MCPDS. In Gordon v. Maine Commission on Public Defense Services, the Law Court explained the process in Maine for attorneys who challenge MCPDS decisions as to their ability to remain on rosters. 2024 ME 59, ¶ 3–7, 320 A.3d 449. Attorney Gordon requested an intra-agency appeal before a hearing officer, who denied his appeal. Id. ¶ 8. MCPDS then ratified the decision of the hearing officer. Id. Attorney Gordon's only recourse was to seek review in the Superior Court, which was of course required to show great deference to MCPDS's decision about his eligibility. Id. ¶ 11. That deference resulted in Attorney Gordon having to appeal to the Law Court, which also described its authority to overturn MCPDS's decision as "deferential and limited." Id. The Law Court stated: "[W]e do not substitute our judgment for that of the agency on questions of fact." Id. The question of fact the Law Court was referring to was Attorney Gordon's eligibility to stay on the rosters maintained by MCPDS. This decision refutes the MCPDS Defendants' new position that all they do is "facilitate" the court assignment process.

The Court has nevertheless reviewed the cases cited by the MCPDS Defendants and finds them inapplicable. There is simply no comparison between the defendants sued in those cases to the MCPDS Defendants. The defendants in the cases cited were actually working directly with and under the supervision of jurists who determined whether an attorney was eligible to be assigned to represent an indigent defendant. The MCPDS Defendants' reliance upon the Penobscot Superior Court's Carey case is also completely misplaced.[6]

Irreparable harm

Plaintiffs called a number of witnesses to testify about the harm they claim is irreparable for persons who are charged with crimes punishable by jail or incarceration, but who must wait an indeterminate amount of time before counsel is finally appointed. MCPDS Defendants claim that the factual record at the most created "speculative harms" because Plaintiffs failed to call any witness or produce evidence that any Plaintiff's "right to a fair trial has been irredeemably lost." Instead, MCPDS Defendants suggest that hundreds of individual Plaintiffs, who are [6] The MCPDS Defendants cite to three federal cases in support of their immunity argument. None of them are analogous to Maine's system of administering public defense services.

The first is Roth v. King, concerning the "Family Court Panels Committee," which was established to work in consultation with the presiding and deputy presiding judges of the District of Columbia Family Court to recommend panels of designated and approved attorneys to represent indigent parties in juvenile delinquency matters. 449 F.3d 1272, 1277 (D.C. Cir. 2006). The defendants in the suit, a group of judges and public defense employees, were judicially immune from injunctive relief—the judges because they were acting in a "judicial capacity" when selecting attorneys for inclusion on the panels and the public defense employees because, by statute, they were tasked with coordinating with and assisting judges during the panel process. Id. at 1286–87.

Second is Durrance v. McFarling, in which a practicing attorney sued two judges for removing him from a "felony defendant appointment list." No. 4:08-cv-289, 2009 WL 1577995 (E.D. Tex. June 4, 2009). Under Texas law, a panel of judges in each county created and maintained a list of attorneys eligible for felony appointments. Id. at *1. The defendant-judges had judicial immunity from suit because the steps they took to assist in removing the plaintiff-attorney from the felony appointments list related to the "general function[s] normally performed" by a judge in that jurisdiction. Id. at *4.

Third, in Ashford v. Bowie, a practicing attorney's application to be placed on a list of attorneys eligible to receive court appointments in murder cases was denied by a panel of judges and attorneys. No. 8:15CV8, 2016 WL 4186952 (D. Neb. Aug. 8, 2016) (vacated and remanded on unrelated grounds by Ashford v. Douglas Cnty., 880 F.3d 990 (8th Cir. 2018)). The attorney sued the panel members, alleging their decision was racially motivated. Id. at *1. The Nebraska legislature expressly tasks judges with the appointment responsibility in cases with indigent defendants. NEB. REV. STAT. §§ 29-3902 to -3906. The judges in this particular county had created a panel of four judges, two private practice attorneys experienced in criminal defense, and the County Public Defender to consider applications to the appointment list. Ashford, 2016 WL 4186952, at *2. The defendant-judges had judicial immunity from suit, and the defendant-public defender had quasi-judicial immunity from suit, because they were engaged in a judicial act, rather than an administrative or executive act, under Nebraska law. Id. at *3.

The MCPDS Defendants' reliance on a Maine Superior Court case and its progeny at the Law Court is similarly misplaced. In the Carey case, three of the named defendants were entitled to quasi-judicial immunity from suit because they were all Judicial Branch employees (court clerks) engaged in the "seemingly" judicial act of appointing counsel. Carey v. Me. Bd. of Overseers of the Bar, No. CV-17-17, 2017 WL 6513581, at *17 (Me. Super. Ct. Oct. 25, 2017). On appeal, the Law Court concluded defendant MCILS (today, MCPDS) and Judicial Branch employees were immune from suit under the Maine Tort Claims Act. Carey v. Bd. of Overseers of Bar, 2018 ME 119, ¶ 25, 192 A.3d 589. The defendants in the Carey case were being sued for damages. Id. ¶¶ 21, 30 n.5.

represented for one day only by "Lawyers of the Day," should try and convince trial judges at seven-day review hearings that their individual cases should be dismissed for lack of a fair trial—even though those Plaintiffs have not come remotely close to having a trial at all because the MCPDS Defendants have failed to provide them with representation. Essentially, they argue that the Court should say the current situation is "good enough"—that the hundreds of Plaintiffs should wait patiently in jails or in the community while on bail until a lawyer is finally provided who might then file motions to dismiss their cases at some undetermined point in time. In some respects, they are reiterating arguments already rejected as to whether this case should have been brought as a class action, as well as their arguments regarding whether any Plaintiff has actually gone without counsel at a "critical stage." The Court stands by its previous rulings on both those issues.

MCPDS Defendants also argue that Plaintiffs overstate federal case law when they assert that deprivation of any constitutional right constitutes irreparable harm. The Court agrees with the Defendants that, for purposes of obtaining injunctive relief, Plaintiffs must establish actual harm.[7] However, after reviewing the factual record in the form of testimony and exhibits, the Court concludes that Plaintiffs have established actual harm, and that it is irreparable.

Plaintiffs called a number of highly experienced defense attorneys, who testified at length about what is lost if counsel is not promptly assigned to provide continuous representation throughout the criminal process. Attorney Amber Tucker, Attorney Walt McKee, Professor Eve Primus, and Professor Rachel Casey all testified credibly about the harms experienced by [7] The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court has found that actual denial of the right to counsel entitles a criminal defendant to relief even without a specific showing of harm due to the absence of counsel. Because unrepresented defendants "could not be expected by themselves to assess and to demonstrate the seriousness of any harm to them," "it is enough that they have shown a violation of that right that may likely result in irremediable harm if not corrected." Lavallee v. Justs. in the Hampden Superior Ct., 812 N.E.2d 895, 905 (Mass. 2004) (emphasis added); Carrasquillo v. Hampden Cnty. Dist. Cts., 142 N.E.3d 28, 44 (Mass. 2020) (emphasis added).

unrepresented defendants when they are not able to conduct initial investigations;[8] when they are not able to participate in timely bail hearings;[9] when they are not able to meaningfully engage in plea bargaining;[10] about the harm to the attorney-client relationship;[11] along with a myriad of significant personal costs,[12] including lost housing, employment, and familial relationships.

A number of the MCPDS Defendants' own experts corroborated important aspects of Plaintiffs' witness testimony, including Commissioner David Soucy, Commission Chair Joshua Tardy, District Defender Frayla Tarpinian, Deputy Director Eleanor Maciag, and Executive Director Jim Billings.

Commissioner Soucy testified that "[e]vidence is lost when there are delays[,] [m]emories fade, tapes are destroyed, opportunities are lost because of the timelines imposed by the court." Soucy Testimony, Jan. 22, 2025, at 214. He also testified about the importance of appointing counsel promptly so that discovery issues can be addressed. Id. at 212–13. He corroborated Professor Casey's testimony when he stated that the prompt appointment of counsel is a reasonable expectation of the client in establishing the attorney-client relationship, as a client "needs some reassurance that their case is being addressed." Id. at 214–15.

Commission Chair Tardy confirmed it is important for people to have counsel at bail hearings because of the substantive rights at stake in those hearings. Tardy Testimony, Jan. 22, 2025, at 204.

District Defender Tarpinian (Region IV) reiterated the barriers facing an unrepresented defendant who tries to conduct their own investigation or receive or interpret the discovery in their case. Tarpinian Testimony, Jan. 24, 2025, at 88–90. And she testified about the importance of having an attorney to address any discovery issues early in a case, id. at 49–52, particularly when considering the difficulties often encountered with the automatic discovery system. Id. at 45–47. She also testified about the challenges facing an unrepresented defendant in drug cases specifically—defendants may be unfamiliar with drug lab testing delays and the implications of those delays on their case. Id. at 46–47; 89–90.

Deputy Director Maciag testified that delays in appointment result in delays in necessary witness interviews being conducted. Maciag Testimony, Jan. 23, 2025, at 38.

And Executive Director Billings did not disagree with Plaintiffs' position that unrepresented criminal defendants are unable to meaningfully participate in plea negotiations without the assistance of counsel. Billings Testimony, Jan. 23, 2025, at 98. He further testified that there are unrepresented defendants who feel "trapped in a coercive system" and plead guilty just to get out of jail. Id. at 98.

While it is true that Attorneys McKee and Tucker and District Defender Tarpinian testified that the kind and extent of harm could vary case to case, these concessions did not undercut the Plaintiffs' central premise that gaps in representation throughout the criminal process cause harms that cannot be repaired or remedied.

The Court finds that Plaintiffs have produced credible and compelling evidence of irreparable harm caused by the MCPDS Defendants' failure to provide continuous representation at all critical stages of the criminal process. While the MCPDS Defendants are correct that the presumption of prejudice, see Penson v. Ohio, 488 U.S. 75, 88–89 (1988); Van v. Jones, 475 F.3d 292, 311–12 (6th Cir. 2007), does not relieve Plaintiffs of their obligation to establish real harm to be eligible for injunctive relief, the Court concludes that Plaintiffs have amply established real, irreparable harm through the testimony of their experts, and as corroborated by a number of Defense witnesses.

Balancing of harms and the public interest

Plaintiffs must also establish that the harm to them outweighs potential harm to the MCPDS Defendants, and that the issuance of an injunction is in the public interest. The parties correctly recognize that when the respondent is a state government or the federal government, the balancing of equities and the public interest merge. Nken v. Holder, 556 U.S. 418, 435 (2009).

Plaintiffs claim that no harm will befall the State if the Court issues injunctive relief for the Plaintiffs, as the MCPDS Defendants would simply be required to follow their statutory and constitutional obligations. Plaintiffs also claim that if counsel is provided to in-custody defendants within seven days of their initial appearance, the criminal justice system in Maine will "guarantee efficiency, make criminal proceedings less burdensome on all involved, and will prevent cases from being needlessly delayed." Pls.' Post-Trial Br. 15. Defendants assert that injunctive relief will harm their interests and the interest of the public by impeding their efforts to increase capacity to provide defense counsel for indigent defendants. And the Defendants question the "last-minute focus on Maine's emerging public defenders' offices as somehow the problem" as an "unfortunate and unproductive detour."

The Court understands that its ability to issue injunctive relief is limited to the leeway granted to the Judicial Branch in Burr v. Department of Corrections, 2020 ME 130, ¶¶ 18–28, 240 A.3d 371. The Defendants properly focus on the controlling language. The Law Court in Burr made clear that when a plaintiff has prevailed on the merits of a Section 1983 claim against a state agency, meaning that a court has ruled a constitutional violation has occurred, the court may grant injunctive relief requiring agency actors to comply with the Constitution without violating separation of powers principles. Id. ¶¶ 23, 27. Put a different way, agency actors are not "harmed" if they make decisions about compliance which might result in them doing things differently than they did before a constitutional violation was found, so long as it is the agency who decides which changes to make which would enable it to fulfill its constitutional obligations. For MCPDS that means providing counsel consistent with the requirements of the Sixth Amendment. See 4 M.R.S. § 1801 (establishing MCPDS, "whose purpose is to provide high-quality, effective and efficient representation . . . consistent with federal and state constitutional and statutory obligations.") and id. § 1804(3)(D) (including among MCPDS's duties to "ensure an adequate pool of qualified attorneys.").

The Court has concluded that the balance of harms weighs significantly in favor of Plaintiffs, and they have therefore established the third criteria for obtaining injunctive relief.

Finally, the public interests in providing the relief requested are significant. They would include the public interest in a fair, functional, and stable criminal justice system; the public interest in the protection of the liberty interests for all the citizens of Maine who are charged with crimes punishable by incarceration; and the public interest in ensuring that the presumption of innocence is meaningfully protected against the power of the State through the effective assistance of counsel.

INJUNCTION ON COUNT I

Before issuing the injunction, the Court will set out its analysis on how to provide a meaningful remedy for Plaintiffs while adhering to the standard set out in Burr. 2020 ME 130, ¶ 27, 240 A.3d 371 ("To . . . enjoin specific conduct that the court found unconstitutional [is] a power that rests with the judiciary.").

The Court will order the MCPDS Defendants to provide continuous representation as required by the Sixth Amendment. The Court understands that the Defendants are constrained by the resources that the Executive and Legislative Branches have provided. There is nothing in the trial record, however, that gives the Court any confidence that those branches will soon be providing the resources that the Defendants state they need. The Court also understands that advocates for improvements in Maine's indigent defense system have always had their work cut out for them. After decades of neglect by State actors, they have had to fight every step of the way to create a system that is independent from the judiciary, free from political interference, and adequately resourced.

What follows is the Ninth Circuit's description of where things stand in Oregon for indigent defendants who are presumed to be innocent but remain incarcerated for indeterminate amounts of time without the benefit of counsel:

> The state arrests a citizen and incarcerates him pending trial. Days, weeks, and months pass without any legal representation. He seeks relief from the authorities—surely a lawyer should help him? In response, he gets a shoulder shrug, a promise that they are "working on it," and nothing more. He remains in jail, without legal counsel or any relief in sight. You might think this passage comes from a 1970s State Department Report on some autocratic regime in the Soviet Bloc. Unfortunately, we do not need to go back in time or across an ocean to witness this Kafkaesque scene. This is the State of Oregon in 2024. . . . Yet, due to an "ongoing public defense crisis" of its own creation, Oregon does not provide indigent criminal defendants their fundamental right to counsel despite Gideon's clear command.

Betschart v. Oregon, 103 F.4th 607, 612 (9th Cir. 2024).

Lest anyone believe that the Ninth Circuit was being overdramatic about what Oregon is facing, or how their problems compare to present circumstances in Maine, some perspective is in order. Oregon has approximately three times the population of Maine. In Betschart, the federal District Court and later the Ninth Circuit were contending at separate points in time with approximately 100 unrepresented indigent defendants who remained in jail pending trial. 103 F.4th at 613. In Maine, while the numbers of unrepresented indigent defendants fluctuate week to week, the number of incarcerated unrepresented defendants fluctuates between 50 to 100. See Pls.' Washer Dep. Ex. 5. Given this, it is fair to say that the situation in Maine is two or three times worse than the situation in Oregon for incarcerated unrepresented defendants. There can be no serious dispute that unrepresented defendants who are incarcerated confront the most significant harms and impediments to obtaining their Sixth Amendment rights. See supra pp. 5–8 (loss of physical liberty, housing, and employment, to name a few). Therefore, the Court believes the focus of the injunction must be to require the MCPDS Defendants to provide representation for the incarcerated Plaintiffs.

The injunction requiring MCPDS Defendants to provide representation for plaintiffs and to prioritize incarcerated plaintiffs does not violate the doctrine of separation of powers

The parties have spent a lot of their efforts over the last two years arguing about who or what is responsible for the current crisis. Clearly, the MCPDS Defendants have, along with the courts, struggled to respond to their day-to-day obligations while at the same time trying to figure out how to best address the growing problem. But if all the parties or system participants do—including the courts—is assign blame to others, nothing will change. And the result will be the normalization of egregious, ongoing violation of fundamental rights. It will then become acceptable in the State of Maine to arrest indigent defendants, hold them in custody for indeterminate periods of time, and deny them access to their State and federal constitutional rights simply because they are poor.

The Court is keenly aware that the MCPDS Defendants did not think it appropriate for the Court to elicit at trial information about the efforts made by its central office to address the problem, along with the capacity of its District Defenders to provide representation. The Defendants misapprehend why the inquiry was important. Again, it was not part of a plan by the Court to take over the agency or to micromanage it. The Court is also aware that the MCPDS Defendants have argued strenuously since the earliest days of this litigation that they have absolutely no ability to comply with any Court order as they are understaffed and under-resourced. And they insist that requiring them to do anything at all would violate the separation of powers doctrine.

The Court is not ordering the MCPDS to violate any of its own regulations or standards. However, it was important for the Court to know how MCPDS has approached the crisis it confronts before the Court decides if it should impose the extraordinary remedies that Plaintiffs—and indeed, sometimes the Defendants—are asking the Court to impose.[13]

The remedy that must be tried first is representation for incarcerated Plaintiffs. That is the primary goal of the injunction the Court has concluded it must issue on Count I. Prioritizing incarcerated Plaintiffs is integral to the relief required in this case, in recognition of the undeniable fact that the incarcerated Plaintiffs experience the most direct and significant harms in terms of loss of liberty, harms caused by the Defendants' failure to provide counsel for them.[14]

[13] See, e.g., Tarpinian Testimony, Jan. 24, 2025, at 86–87 (Question by Attorney Kevin Martin for Plaintiffs: "If sheriffs were ordered to release persons who had been held for seven days without counsel, would that interfere with the operations of your public defender's office?" Answer by District Defender Tarpinian: "It would not." Question by Attorney Kevin Martin for Plaintiffs: "And if charges were dismissed against persons who – who had gone without counsel for 45 days, would that interfere with the operations of your public defender's office?" Answer by District Defender Tarpinian: "No. It would help.").

[14] The Court would emphasize that the MCPDS Defendants are not being ordered to comply with any Lavallee-type protocol as a remedy in Count I. See infra pp. 35–39. The statutory framework that resulted in the "Lavallee protocol," discussed further under Count III and used by Massachusetts to solve their indigent defense crisis, is obviously different from a Section 1983 claim. The Lavallee and Carrasquillo cases are important, however, in part because Massachusetts was able to implement guardrails to ensure that the courts would not encroach on the

There is some existing capacity in the system which would enable MCPDS to presently comply with their obligation to provide continuous representation under the Sixth Amendment for at least some of the incarcerated, unrepresented indigent defendants

The Court's factual findings from trial establish that there is some capacity within the system which would give MCPDS Defendants the ability to comply with their obligations to provide continuous representation for Plaintiffs, particularly for unrepresented indigent defendants who are incarcerated for an indeterminate amount of time. Steps they could consider include retaining counsel, as they did in child protective cases, to make calls to find counsel willing to take cases "off the spreadsheet." They could also escalate their efforts, as Executive Director Billings indicated in his testimony, to offer waivers to private counsel.[15] According to him, there are clearly excess unused "points" in the system.

The Defendants could also immediately require District Defenders to take cases off the in-custody, unrepresented spreadsheet, even if that means that they take the cases "nobody wants." Clearly some of the District Defenders are handling just a few of their own cases, if any. As the Court noted in its Findings, if the District Defenders each took 10 cases off the in-custody unrepresented spreadsheet, the spreadsheet would essentially be cut in half.

All of the above could occur almost immediately. But as Burr held, the Court has no authority to micromanage or set policies for the agency. And so the Court feels compelled to emphasize it is not ordering MCPDS to take any of those steps. It is completely up to them to independence of the agency charged in the Commonwealth to run its indigent defense system, while at the same time ensuring that a meaningful remedy was provided for unrepresented indigent defendants.

In both Lavallee and Carrasquillo, the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court began by recognizing the limits of its authority under its own separation of powers doctrine, and it approved the imposition of extraordinary remedies only as a last resort. The process required under Lavallee was for the trial court to establish as a factual matter that the agency had been given the opportunity to provide counsel consistent with its obligations and standards, and then to establish that capacity within the system to provide representation had been exhausted before any other remedies would be imposed. Lavallee, 812 N.E.2d at 911–12; Carrasquillo, 142 N.E.3d at 50 –52.

[15] Other efforts would obviously require changes in rulemaking but could be considered, including temporarily suspending or modifying caseload standards or requiring LODs to remain on a case until trial counsel is available, thus providing continuous representation.

decide how they intend to come into compliance with the Sixth Amendment, but the options described do exist. Burr, 2020 ME 130, ¶ 27, 240 A.3d 371.

The Court agrees with the Plaintiffs that Defendants should be given a reasonable amount of time to decide how to comply, and they will be given a deadline to provide their plan to opposing counsel and to the Court.

The time frame for providing representation for incarcerated Plaintiffs will also be the timeframe under which the MCPDS Defendants are required to prepare a plan for how to come into compliance with their other ongoing obligations to provide counsel for unrepresented indigent defendants in Maine.

The Court cannot and does not expect miracles. The Defendants can only do what is possible. But it is clear that the Defendants have not been prioritizing finding or providing counsel for the incarcerated Plaintiffs "on the spreadsheet" who are waiting for MCPDS to do just that. Each and every one of these individuals has been found indigent by a court. Each one of them appears to be a Subclass member. The Defendants must prioritize finding counsel for them, and the Court believes the Defendants can do so using existing resources. How they choose to do that is up to the MCPDS Defendants, and the Court is confident that MCPDS can find a way to provide counsel for some, if not all of the incarcerated Plaintiffs.

After MCPDS has an opportunity to provide counsel for the unrepresented Plaintiffs, it will likely be necessary for the Court to provide Plaintiffs with other forms of relief not available to them in Count I. The Court will address those proposed remedies further in Count III; but again, to be clear, they are not a part of the remedies being provided in Count I.

On Count I, the Court issues the following Order:

(1) The Court declares that the MCPDS Defendants are required to provide continuous representation for all Subclass Members as previously defined by the Court, and further declares that they have failed to do so in violation of the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution.

(2) The MCPDS Defendants are ordered to create and file with the Court a written plan on how they intend to remedy the ongoing violations of the Sixth Amendment for all Subclass members, whether they are in-custody or in the community subject to bail conditions, and to do so by April 3, 2025.

(3) The MCPDS Defendants are further ordered to prioritize and to make good faith efforts to actually provide counsel for the unrepresented, incarcerated defendants who, as of this same date, are listed on the so-called "without counsel" spreadsheet, and to do so by April 3, 2025. They must also by that date advise the Court as to how successful they have been in these efforts.

COUNT III

In its January 3, 2025 Order, the Court granted Plaintiffs' Motion for Summary Judgment on the issue of liability only for Count III based on their successful arguments regarding violations of the Sixth Amendment on Count I. The Court reserved ruling "on any arguments the parties might make as to primacy or co-extensiveness between the Sixth Amendment and Article I, Section 6 of the Maine Constitution." Jan. 3rd Order, at 40.

At the January 6, 2025 Pretrial Conference and again before trial commenced on January 22, 2025, counsel for Plaintiffs and for Party-in-Interest State of Maine stipulated that Article I, Section 6 of the Maine Constitution conveyed at least the same, if not more, constitutional protections to Maine citizens as they enjoy under the Sixth Amendment.

Consequently, the Court will now find that Plaintiffs are entitled to habeas relief under both the Sixth Amendment and Article I, Section 6 of the Maine Constitution for failing to provide continuous representation to indigent defendants at all stages of the criminal process.

Habeas remedies and the parties' Count III arguments

Article I, Section 10 of the Maine Constitution states that "the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it." Me. Const. art. I, § 10. The Law Court has found that the writ of habeas corpus is broadly available to secure the right of personal liberty to anyone who has been illegally deprived of his freedom. Stewart v. Smith, 101 Me. 397, 64 A. 663, 664 (1906). It has been held to apply not only to persons accused of a crime, but also to persons who have been held against their will as mentally ill if their detention violates their constitutional rights. A.S. v. LincolnHealth, 2021 ME 6, ¶ 11, 246 A.3d 157.

In Maine, "[e]very person unlawfully deprived of his personal liberty by the act of another . . . shall of right have a writ of habeas corpus according to the provisions herein contained." 14 M.R.S. § 5501. The Plaintiffs argue that in Maine, habeas remedies are available to persons subject to physical custody in jail or prison, but also to persons whose liberty is restrained by the imposition of bail conditions and personal recognizance, if the deprivations they endure are unlawful.

The United States Supreme Court has held that the "Great Writ" is not just available to individuals held in "actual, physical custody in prison or jail." Jones v. Cunningham, 371 U.S. 236, 238 (1963). Instead, the Court looked to the use of habeas in common law England, concluding that "there are other restraints on a man's liberty, restraints not shared by the public generally, which have been thought sufficient . . . to support the issuance of habeas corpus." Id. at 240. These other restraints, the Court concluded, included parole, which "significantly restrain[s] [an individual's] liberty to do those things which in this country free men are entitled to do" and thus was "enough to invoke the help of the Great Writ." Id. at 243. The habeas remedy "is not now and never has been a static, narrow, formalistic remedy; its scope has grown to achieve its grand purpose—the protection of individuals against erosion of their right to be free from wrongful restraints upon their liberty." Id. at 242–43.

The language in Maine's habeas statute does not dampen or limit the scope of the "Great Writ" under common law. Maine's habeas law embraces the spirit of the remedy by explicitly affording relief beyond only release from physical detainment—repeatedly using the language "imprisonment or restraint" when referring to the unlawful deprivation of an individual's personal liberty by the action of another. See, e.g., 14 M.R.S. §§ 5510, 5511, 5515, 5518, 5521–23. Basic statutory interpretation tells the Court that "restraint" refers to something distinct from "imprisonment." When considered in concert with the history of the "Great Writ," the Court concludes that the "unlawfully depriv[ation] of . . . personal liberty," id. § 5501, can include more than physical custody in a Maine jail or prison.

Plaintiffs clarify that what they are seeking is a conditional writ, which they describe as the "most common and least intrusive form of relief: a conditional order of release from the unlawful restraints on their liberty." Pls.' Post-Trial Br. 26 (citing Wilkinson v. Dotson, 544 U.S. 74, 89 (2005)). With a conditional writ, "the state is given a window of time to cure the infirmity within which it might cure the error." Satterlee v. Wolfenbarger, 453 F.3d 362, 369 (6th Cir. 2006). If the state fails to comply with the stated conditions, the conditional writ of habeas corpus "requires" release. Id.

While not exactly conceding liability in Count III, Counsel for Party-in-Interest State of Maine (hereinafter "State")[16] agreed that the issues regarding what remedy, if any, should be [16] Maine's 16 county sheriffs were named as necessary Respondents as they are the custodians of approximate 100 Plaintiffs who are incarcerated in Maine county jails. They were remotely present for all trial proceedings and were given the opportunity to call witnesses, examine witnesses, and make argument. None of them called or examined witnesses, but the Court has reviewed their written submissions and will grant their requests to provide names of provided in Count III was at this stage more of a legal than factual matter. And it does not challenge the concept that release is required if an individual's detention is illegal. At the same time, the State makes the argument that the Court must conduct an individualized, fact-specific inquiry into what remedy is appropriate for an individual, now that the Court has found that their rights to counsel under the Sixth Amendment and Article I, Section 6 have been violated by the MCPDS Defendants.

The State relies in large part on United States v. Morrison, 449 U.S. 361 (1981), for its oft-cited language that as a general rule in cases involving violations of the Sixth Amendment, "remedies should be tailored to the injury suffered from the constitutional violation and should not unnecessarily infringe on competing interests." Id. at 364.

In Morrison, which was not a habeas case, the Supreme Court reversed a Third Circuit decision dismissing with prejudice an indictment where DEA agents had intentionally contacted the defendant, who they knew was under indictment and had retained counsel. Id. at 362–63. The agents made disparaging statements to her about her attorney and essentially told her that if she did not cooperate with them, she would face a harsh sentence. Id. at 362. She declined to cooperate with them, but they tried again. Id. She informed her attorney, who was able to convince the Circuit Court that the federal agents' conduct merited dismissal of the indictment with prejudice. Id. at 363. The Supreme Court reversed, saying there was no evidence their conduct had prejudiced the quality of her representation or had adversely affected her legal position. Id. at 366–67.

Class Members who are in jail, which jail they are currently held, and what is expected of any sheriff as far as transporting that individual to any proceedings, and obviously providing as much advance notice as possible to the sheriffs and their attorneys before any in-court proceedings occur.

It is somewhat mystifying why the State believes Morrison controls how the Court should respond to the constitutional violations found under Count III given the facts of Ms. Morrison's case. Ms. Morrison actually had an attorney, an effective one to boot. The Morrison Court explicitly distinguishes its decision from the facts of Gideon v. Wainwright, because, of course, Mr. Gideon had no attorney. Id. at 364 ("In Gideon v. Wainwright, the defendant was totally denied the assistance of counsel.") (internal citations omitted).

To the extent the State suggests that Morrison requires Sixth Amendment remedies be provided in proportion to the harm caused, the Court agrees with that general principle. But to the extent the State suggests Morrison stands for the proposition that a dismissal can never be an appropriate remedy for a Sixth Amendment violation, the Court disagrees. There is simply no language in Morrison to support the State's position. The Circuit Court dismissed her indictment with prejudice even though she had an attorney, and, understandably, the Supreme Court found the Circuit Court had gone too far. In this case, Plaintiffs do not seek that kind of relief. The dismissals they seek are dismissals without prejudice, meaning that if their cases are dismissed, they could and should expect that they will be charged again by the State. By contrast, Ms. Morrison walked free until the Supreme Court held otherwise.

The Court is aware that some trial courts in Maine have been using a form that cites Morrison at the so-called seven-day review hearings that were established by the Trial Chiefs of the Superior and District Courts in November of 2023. Pls.' Ex. 1, Order on Delay in Appointment of Counsel at an Appearance Pursuant to the Standing Order on Initial Assignment of Counsel (dated Mar. 22, 2024). The so-called Standing Order required that any indigent person who was being held in jail for more than seven days without counsel be brought before a judge to "review" their status. It appears that many jurists routinely find violations of the Sixth Amendment at these hearings, and those that use the form order check a box that cites to Morrison. The form states in pre-printed language that the defendant is not subject to release as the defendant's right to counsel "does not outweigh the competing interests including society's interest in the administration of criminal justice." Id. It is not clear if the meaning of that phrase is ever explained to the defendant who is simply returned to custody and their cases remain on the court's docket.

To be clear, this is not a Judicial Branch form, despite its appearance to the contrary. More concerning is that it blithely cites to language in Morrison about the "State's competing interest including society's interest in the administration of criminal justice" as a reason to deny any remedy at all to a criminal defendant who has been held in jail without counsel, which was hardly Ms. Morrison's situation. The Court concludes that Morrison does not control its decision in Count III.

Dismissal without prejudice as a pre-conviction remedy

Counsel for the State argues that dismissal without prejudice is not an appropriate habeas remedy in the pre-conviction context. The Court has concluded otherwise.

Plaintiffs are being denied the right to counsel at critical stages—during bail hearings, the investigatory phase, and plea bargaining. The Plaintiffs who are not in-custody but are instead in the community on conditions of release are nevertheless being deprived of their personal liberty by these conditions. The restraints on liberty are numerous, and any practitioner of criminal law could list them from memory: conditions of release restrict a defendant's freedom of movement; freedom of association; where they may live and with whom; where they may be employed; what they may own or possess; whether they may access the Internet, etc. See 15 M.R.S. § 1026(3)(A)(1)–(19); see attached JB Conditions of Release form and Bail Bond form. Violation of any condition imposed is itself a crime. id. § 1092. The State can also move to revoke a defendant's bail and obtain a warrant for the defendant's arrest. Id. § 1095–96. Upon the State's motion, the court can then order the defendant be held without bail pending trial. Id. § 1097.

It is the ongoing violations of the Plaintiffs' right to counsel under the Sixth Amendment and Article I, Section 6 that make these restraints unlawful. They may live in the community, but significant liberties have been taken away from them. And while being deprived of their liberty by the State, it is the State that has failed to provide them with an attorney.

The State's argument fails to appreciate that Plaintiffs cannot be free of these restrictions unless and until the charges against them have been resolved; only then does a court declare that they are "released" from bail and bail conditions. Their argument fails to grasp that the Plaintiffs do not have access to the court to resolve their case because the Maine courts cannot constitutionally require them to stand trial—or even attend a dispositional conference—until an attorney is provided by the State. The Court has concluded that the circumstances of these Plaintiffs constitute "unlawful depriv[ation] of . . . personal liberty" entitling them to a writ of habeas corpus. See 14 M.R.S. § 5501.

In addition, habeas in Maine is not just a post-conviction remedy. Indeed, Maine law explicitly recognizes that an individual's liberty can be unlawfully restrained before conviction. See, e.g., 14 M.R.S. § 5511 ("any party alleged to be imprisoned or restrained of his liberty but not convicted and sentenced" (emphasis added)). The fact that they have not been convicted does not foreclose redress. The Plaintiffs' right to counsel under the Maine and United States Constitutions is being denied, and while waiting for the State to provide counsel they must live with significant loss of liberties. And "every right, when withheld, must have a remedy, and every injury its proper redress." Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 5 U.S. 137, 147 (1803).

The role of public safety in habeas claims

The State also objects to releasing any Plaintiff who may present public safety concerns and has repeatedly taken to reminding this Court of what happened when a trial court judge lowered bail for one defendant following a review hearing. After being released, the defendant assaulted his former partner and killed another person.

No Judge or Justice in either the District or Superior Court needs to be reminded about the consequences of decisions that they make every single day in Maine courtrooms. Public safety is always top of mind for many decisions Maine jurists make in criminal cases. It is important, however, to remember that given the conditions under which most jurists work when making bail decisions, they are often expected in a matter of minutes to apply the bail code to an unpredictable number of individuals, and to do so in reliance upon information supplied by others in the criminal justice system who may also be working under difficult conditions. Jurists in Maine are not permitted to conduct their own investigations of the facts of a case or the personal characteristics of a criminal defendant. If the information conveyed is inadequate, or if a judge makes a decision based on information from others, or, as often happens, an agreement is reached by prosecutors and defense counsel that bail should be lowered or a defendant released, judges have come to understand that they will likely be the person blamed or berated for whatever dangerous act a criminal defendant might decide to commit after their release.

It is sometimes the case, however, that the Maine and United States Constitutions actually require that someone be released from custody or restraint. For example, when a jury finds that the State has not proven a defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, they are instructed that they must follow the Constitution and return a verdict of not guilty. Unless the defendant is held on other charges, that means they are released into the community, even if they are dangerous.

The jury is not permitted to consider public safety; they must follow the law and the Constitution. When the Law Court reverses a criminal conviction due to prosecutorial misconduct, or because a defendant's Fourth, Fifth, or Sixth Amendment rights have been violated by State actors, the person released may have actually committed a violent act, or they may go on to commit a violent act upon their release. Recently, in State v. Akers, 2021 ME 43, 259 A.3d 127, the Law Court reviewed a jury's conviction of a defendant for intentional or knowing murder after the defendant killed his neighbor with a machete. The Law Court vacated the defendant's conviction for violations of his Fourth, Fifth, and Fourteenth Amendment rights stemming from two illegal, warrantless searches and involuntary inculpatory statements by the defendant. Public records confirm that upon remand to the Superior Court, the State was compelled to dismiss the charges against the defendant because it lacked the evidence required to sustain a conviction. In the Law Court's Akers decision, it never weighed the violence that the defendant committed and was convicted of against the potential risk to public safety in determining that the defendant's rights had been violated. Instead, the Law Court was compelled by the law and the Constitution to find that his conviction "must be vacated." Id. ¶ 50.

Just like a Maine jury, jurists on the Law Court, the Superior Court, and the District Court must all follow the law and the Constitution. Every Maine jury and every Maine jurist takes an oath to do so. So when these difficult decisions are made, it would be extreme unlikely that it occurred because a jury or a jurist did something they simply felt like doing. It would be because a jury or a jurist took an oath to uphold constitutional standards and to follow the law. And in a habeas claim, release from custody or from restraint is required if the restraint is illegal.

The Plaintiffs in this case have not been convicted of the crimes for which they are charged. Each of them is still presumed to be innocent under the Maine and United States

Constitutions. And yet many of them remain in custody, without counsel. Their only access to due process is to be brought before a judge every seven days, represented by counsel who are permitted by the MCPDS rules to represent them for all of one day. They are brought before judges, most of whom are essentially doing bail hearings—not habeas hearings. The Maine Bail Code does not permit a judge to dismiss a case, and it was never designed or intended to provide remedies for the constitutional violations at issue here. As Justice Douglas stated in Peterson v. Johnson, the Review Hearings were never intended to be the solution to this crisis. SJC-23-02, at 29–30 (Jan. 12, 2024) (Douglas, J.) ("[T]he regular status hearings held pursuant to the Standing Order are intended as a limited, short-term response to an on-going crisis, and do not justify indefinite delay by the State in assigning counsel to in-custody defendants entitled to a court-appointed attorney.").

The Court fully intends to factor in the legitimate concerns about public safety expressed by the State in their argument regarding habeas relief, just as the Ninth Circuit did in Betschart. And while Morrison stands for the proposition that judicial relief provided for violations of the Sixth Amendment must be proportional to how grievous the violation was and what harm has been caused, it is not a habeas case, and it never mentions the phrase "public safety" anywhere. More importantly, Morrison should not be read as a reason for Maine courts to do nothing when significant systemic failures have resulted in the complete lack of counsel for a significant number of indigent defendants.

Reducing backlogs or MCPDS caseloads by dismissing cases

It has also been suggested at various times that dismissing cases through this lawsuit could work as a curative case management tool to reduce trial court backlogs or somehow help MCPDS address its ongoing challenges. The suggestion has come from both sides and at various stages of this litigation. The Court categorically rejects these as improper considerations, and they will not play any part in this Order.

It may become necessary for the Court to dismiss cases, but if that happens the Court understands it is unlikely that other systemic problems will be solved. Prosecutors will likely continue to file more cases than the court system can handle, and no court can stop them from filing anything they choose to. MCPDS will in all likelihood continue to struggle with being under-resourced, which in the current budget before the Legislature means that they will be unable to roll out more public defender offices and that they could run out of funds in the next year or so to pay the private attorneys who are currently willing to take cases. Those are problems no court in Maine has any authority to remedy.

HABEAS RELIEF ON COUNT III

After considering the arguments of counsel and reviewing pertinent case law, the Court has concluded that Plaintiffs are entitled to habeas relief. The nature of the remedies available to a Plaintiff under a Section 1983 claim and a habeas claim are quite different. However, the Court will attempt to structure the relief provided for each Count to be as consistent as possible. Therefore, the timelines established in Count I are intended to give the MCPDS Defendants (who are not named Defendants in Count III) the time and opportunity to comply with the initial requirement of the Court's injunction that they provide counsel for the incarcerated Plaintiffs. The starting date for carrying out the habeas relief will be delayed briefly to see how many Plaintiffs remain in custody after the MCPDS Defendants decide how to comply with the Court's injunction and provide counsel for them. To be clear, however, the Court does not intend to wait indefinitely to provide relief under Count III while MCPDS decides what to do in Count I.

Three cases from other jurisdictions provide the framework for how habeas relief will be provided. These cases, Betschart, Lavallee, and Carrasquillo, are really the only cases this Court, or any court, has to go on. And that is because only a few states—Oregon, Massachusetts, and now Maine—have found themselves in this position facing similar crises.

The Court will rely upon the aforementioned cases: Betschart, which was a class action habeas case, 103 F.4th 607 (9th Cir. 2024); and two cases from Massachusetts which predate Betschart but were not habeas cases, Lavallee, 812 N.E.2d 895 (Mass. 2004), and Carrasquillo, 142 N.E.3d 28 (Mass. 2020). What they have in common is that all three provided meaningful remedies for Plaintiffs identically situated to the Plaintiffs in Maine. In the Court's view, they all offer sound approaches for providing relief that is proportionate to the gravity of the violation and harms caused, while at the same time ensuring consideration of other important public concerns, including public safety.

In Betschart, the Ninth Circuit on May 31, 2024 affirmed the granting of habeas relief issued by the United States District Court in Oregon. 103 F.4th at 613. The case was filed as a class action brought by federal public defenders on behalf of state indigent defendants who were eligible for appointment of counsel but who remained unrepresented for indeterminate periods of time in local jails. Id. at 611, 613.

The District Court granted a temporary restraining order, and applied essentially the same standards that this Court did for Count I. Id. at 614. The District Court declared that the State of Oregon was violating the Sixth Amendment, and it ordered that the sheriffs who had custody of the class members release them unless the State of Oregon provided representation within seven days of the defendant's initial appearance, or within seven days of the withdrawal of previously appointed counsel. Id. Each released class member was brought before a state court judge to set reasonable bail conditions to address the State's concerns regarding public safety. Id. at 613; Betschart v. Garrett, 700 F.Supp.3d 965, 988 (D. Or. 2023). The District Court denied relief to persons who were charged with certain offenses if the Oregon Constitution prohibited pretrial release. Betschart, 103 F.4th at 614. And it made clear that relief would not be available for defendants who repeatedly "fired" their attorneys in order to be released. Betschart v. Garrett, No. 3:23-CV-01097-CL, 2023 WL 7621969, at *1 (D. Or. Nov. 14, 2023).

The Maine Superior Court is clearly not the Ninth Circuit. But closer to home and Maine's jurisprudential traditions, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts in 2004 and again in 2020 confronted the same problem that exists in Oregon, and now in Maine. The approach taken by the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court in both begins with an explicit recognition that courts in the Commonwealth are constrained by the doctrine of separation of powers but could nonetheless provide a meaningful remedy for unrepresented defendants.

First, in Lavallee, a group of indigent criminal defendants being held pretrial without attorneys sought relief in the form of a writ by the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court pursuant to Mass. G.L. ch. 211 § 3. Lavallee v. Justs. in the Hampden Superior Ct., 812 N.E.2d 895, 899–900 (Mass. 2004). Petitioners alleged that Massachusetts's "chronic underfunding" of its assigned counsel system led to an insufficient number of attorneys willing to accept indigent defense cases. Id. at 900. The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court ruled that the petitioners were being denied the right to counsel under its state constitution. Id. at 901. To address the petitioners' complete denial of the right to counsel, the court fashioned a remedy recognizing that > [t]he harm involved here, the absence of counsel, cannot be remedied in the normal course of trial and appeal because an essential component of the "normal course," the assistance of counsel, is precisely what is missing here. The course of the proceedings in these cases is per se not normal.

Id. at 907. The court established what is now known as the "Lavallee protocol"—every week, the clerk of the county courts would be required to prepare a list of the unrepresented criminal defendants to forward to the district attorney, the attorney general, the chief counsel for the public defenders, and the judges tasked with administrative and scheduling decisions. Id. at 911–12. Using this list, the administrative judge would schedule a status hearing as to each defendant who had either been held in custody for more than seven days or whose case has been pending for more than forty-five days. Id. at 912. At the hearing, the judge would determine whether the public defense committee has made a "good faith effort" to secure representation for each defendant. Id. If, despite a good faith effort, there was no counsel available to represent a defendant, the judge was required to, if the defendant had been held in custody for seven days or more, order the defendant be released from custody, subject to conditions; or, if the defendant's case had been pending for forty-five days or more, order the defendant's charges be dismissed without prejudice until counsel could be made available to the defendant. Id. at 912–13. This solution, the court reasoned, acknowledged that "[t]he duty to provide . . . counsel falls squarely on government, and the burden of a systemic lapse is not to be borne by defendants." Id. at 911.

In 2020, the indigent defense attorney shortage recurred. In Carrasquillo v. Hampden County District Courts, 142 N.E.3d 28 (Mass. 2020), a shortage of defense attorneys available on arraignment days led a judge to order a public defense office to provide counsel "who shall accept appointment in all cases as ordered by the Court." Id. at 41. The overseeing public defense committee filed an emergency petition for a writ, seeking to vacate the judge's order. Id. at 42. The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court ruled that the judge's order was invalid because it infringed on the committee's statutory authority to control caseload limits, but it reaffirmed the Lavallee protocol as an appropriate method for remedying constitutional violations for deprivation of counsel. Id. at 35, 44, 47, 49–51.

Notably, the condition of indigent defense in Massachusetts has improved since the Carrasquillo decision. After the Supreme Judicial Court's opinion in March of 2020, a single justice of the high court required the parties to regularly provide the court with information so that they could periodically assess whether the Lavallee protocol was still required in the county courts. Carrasquillo v. Hampden Cnty. Dist. Courts, 2021 WL 5441084, at *1 (Mass. Oct. 21, 2021) (Wendlandt, J.). After months of "deteriorating" circumstances in which the number of indigent criminal defendants without counsel increased, with a dispute as to whether the public defense committee actually lacked the capacity to represent indigent defendants, the single justice assigned a retired associate justice to the case. Id. The retired justice was ordered to prepare a report for the court discussing the causes of the indigent defense counsel shortage and possible solutions based on the parties' joint recommendations. Id.

The retired justice submitted his report to the court in March of 2022, and in June of 2022, the single justice lifted the Lavallee protocol. Carrasquillo v. Hampden Cnty., 2022 WL 2902767, at *1 (Mass. June 30, 2022). The "crisis ha[d] abated"; there were just two unrepresented indigent defendants in Hampden County, each having been on the list for less than four days. Id. The justice attributed the change in circumstances "largely, if not entirely, to the extraordinary efforts of the parties to address the problems and find solutions." Id. The public defense committee had successfully opened a second office of twelve attorneys in the county, had increased rates for private attorneys, and waived the cap on the number of hours a private attorney could bill for the year. Id. The justice noted that these changes, while perhaps brought to bear by the "awareness of the urgency" required by the Lavallee protocol, would continue to be effective even without the protocol in place. Id. The county courts would continue to circulate weekly lists of unrepresented defendants, and the public defense committee would continue to provide the court with periodic six month updates, including (1) the number of unrepresented defendants and specifically the number in custody; (2) the length of time each has gone without counsel and the charges pending against them; (3) the current caseloads of public defenders and private contracted attorney; and (4) the committee's efforts to increase the availability of counsel for unrepresented defendants, including the status of any ongoing efforts to petition the Legislature for continued additional funding. Id. The county courts and the district attorney would be invited to file a response to each update. Id.

In Lavallee and Carrasquillo, the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court ordered the same relief as Betschart and more. It ordered both release from custody after seven days and dismissal without prejudice after forty-five days without counsel.

Importantly, however, the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court also added one critical requirement to the findings made at individual hearings where eligibility for relief would be confirmed and provided. In part in recognition of the separation of powers and the authority delegated to the agency in the Commonwealth to staff and administer indigent defense, it required the Court to hear from those state actors about their ability and capacity to provide counsel, and to establish as a factual matter that, despite "good faith efforts," the agency was unable to do so. See Lavallee, 812 N.E.2d at 912. Only if capacity was truly exhausted in an individual case would the court step in.

The Court would emphasize what it stated as to Count I. The most appropriate remedy it can provide to Plaintiffs is representation. Release or dismissal without prejudice pursuant to this Order may be necessary, but only as a last resort. However, if representation has become available at the time the Court issues relief for individual Plaintiffs, the constitutional violation has been remedied.

While neither the Maine Constitution nor Maine's habeas statute, 14 M.R.S. §§ 5501–46, provides for the very limited factual inquiry the Court will require, Plaintiffs do not object to the Court requiring this "check" to ensure that the appropriate remedy is being provided. Plaintiffs here seek a "conditional remedy" and the Court believes it has the authority to add another condition to that remedy by requiring that a representative from MCPDS—who the Court understands is not a party to Count III—advise the Court it has had an opportunity to find counsel, and whether it has made a good faith effort to do so before the Court acts. That factual determination is required by the separation of powers, and the Court trusts that MCPDS will cooperate in providing this information when requested by the Court.

The Court therefore concludes that Plaintiffs are entitled to habeas corpus relief for violations of their Sixth Amendment and Article I, Section 6 rights to continuous representation. Relief will be provided as follows:

1) On April 7, 2025 at 10:00 a.m., counsel for the parties in this matter, including counsel for the Maine county sheriffs, shall attend a hearing at the Capital Judicial Center to set the course of future habeas proceedings. By that date, the Court should have received information from MCPDS regarding their efforts to provide counsel for incarcerated Plaintiffs. The first round of hearings will prioritize any Plaintiffs who remain incarcerated, and relief will be provided to them consistent with this Order. Any attorney for the sheriffs may appear remotely.

2) Counsel for the parties shall have by that date agreed to and prepared a list of all Plaintiffs who are incarcerated awaiting appointment of counsel in any Maine jail or correctional facility. The list shall include the name and physical location of any Plaintiff, and shall be shared with all Maine sheriffs, all District Attorneys, the Office of the Attorney General, and the Executive Director of MCPDS. The list shall be based upon the Counsel Needed spreadsheets provided to MCPDS by the Judicial Branch. The list shall also include the docket numbers for any pending charges for the Plaintiffs.

3) The Court will conduct several court sessions at several locations in northern, central, and southern Maine during the month of April 2025. The court locations and dates of each session will be provided no later than April 7, 2025. The locations will be determined with the goal of assisting the sheriffs in arranging transport for any Plaintiffs in their custody.

4) Only Plaintiffs held in physical custody shall receive notices to appear at the first round of hearings conducted in April of 2025. Other hearings for Plaintiffs who are out on bail will be the subject of habeas relief hearings beginning in May of 2025 on a schedule to be discussed and set by the Court at the conference on April 7, 2025. Ongoing hearings are expected to be necessary for Plaintiffs in and out of custody.

5) MCPDS will provide counsel for these Plaintiffs at every hearing conducted.

6) The Court will rely upon the physical court files which it will have in its possession at each hearing in determining whether the individual is a Class member, and as to any pertinent dates for when the individual first appeared before the court, when bail was set and in what amount, and how long they have been held. The Court will be assisted by a clerk who will have access to MEJIS during any court proceeding.

7) The sheriffs do not need to personally appear at these hearings, but they shall designate a representative to appear who can verify how long the person has been held, and on what charges.

8) At the hearings for incarcerated Plaintiffs, the Court will determine if MCPDS has made a good faith effort to secure representation. This determination for the hearings conducted in April of 2025 shall be made in person by an MCPDS employee designated by the agency. After the first round of hearings, the Court is willing to accept written affidavits submitted by the MCPDS Defendants so long as the information is individually tailored to each individual Plaintiff.

9) At the hearings for incarcerated Plaintiffs, the Court will hear from counsel for the individual, from the prosecuting attorney, and from the MCPDS representatives. The Court will also hear from Class Counsel and from any attorney from the Office of the Attorney General who has been involved in this litigation if they wish to be heard.

10) After hearing from the parties, the Court will make the following determinations:
   a. Whether the individual Plaintiff is a Subclass member as defined by the Court;
   b. Whether MCPDS has made good faith efforts to secure representation for the individual; and

c. Whether there is still no attorney available to represent the individual.

If the Court determines that, despite the good faith efforts of MCPDS and any efforts by others to find representation for the individual, there is still no counsel willing and available to represent the individual, the Court shall order as follows:

> For any Subclass member who has been detained and remains without counsel for more than 14 days after their initial appearance or arraignment, or more than 14 days after leave for withdrawal of counsel has been granted, this Court will order release of the individual from detention unless within 7 additional days after the habeas hearing, counsel is provided. However, the Court will impose conditions of release related to ensuring the presence of the individual at the next court appearance, and to ensure the safety of the community. These conditions can include any condition authorized under the Maine Bail Code sufficient to protect public safety and ensure the integrity of the judicial process; and the Court may do so without the consent of the individual. This Court must advise the individual of the consequences of violation of any condition of release, and the consequence of committing new criminal conduct while they are out on bail.
> This relief shall not be available for any individual who is being held without bail after his or her right to bail has been extinguished because they are charged with a formerly capital offense. See 15 M.R.S. § 1027(3).
>
> With respect to Subclass members who have remained without counsel for more than 60 days after their initial appearance or arraignment or more than 60 days after counsel has been granted leave to withdraw, the Court shall order that the charges against the Subclass member be dismissed without prejudice until such time as counsel is available to provide representation of the individual, unless within 7 additional days after the habeas hearing, counsel is provided. This order applies both to Plaintiffs who are incarcerated and those living in the community subject to bail conditions.
>
> No relief set out above for incarcerated Plaintiffs or Plaintiffs residing in the community on bail shall be available if the individual persists in "firing" appointed counsel for less than good cause, and/or in order to obtain relief.
> For current members of the Subclass, the 60-day deadline shall begin running on the date this Order is signed and docketed by the Court.

COUNT V

The Defendant State of Maine has again raised the sovereign immunity defense as to both the request for declaratory judgment and for injunctive relief under Count V.

As to the declaratory judgment, the Court stands by its August 13, 2024 Order on Pending Motions to Dismiss, in which it relied on Welch v. State, 2004 ME 884, 852 A.2d 214, to conclude the State was not immune from Plaintiffs' request for declaratory judgment against the State. Aug. 13, 2024 Order, at 12–15. Judge Duddy's Footnote 15 in NECEC reinforces the Court's decision to do so. When the NECEC case was before the Business and Consumer Court, Judge Duddy did not formally address the sovereign immunity defense raised by the defendants, having denied plaintiff-energy company's motion for preliminary injunction for failure to meet their burden. NECEC Transmission LLC v. Bureau of Parks & Land, No. BCD-CIV-2021-00058, 2021 WL 6125325, at *8 n.15 (Me. B.C.D. Dec. 16, 2021). Nonetheless, the court stated it was "inclined to agree" with the line of cases across several other states which hold that, in an action seeking a declaratory judgment regarding constitutionality, sovereign immunity is not an available defense. Id. "[T]he availability of judicial review here appears to be integral to the constitutional framework," Judge Duddy wrote. Id. Granting the state immunity from constitutional claims "would undermine and destroy the principle of judicial review." Id. (quoting Jones v. Bd. of Trs. of Ky. Retirement Sys., 910 S.W.2d 710, 713 (Ky. 1995)).

As to the issue of injunctive relief under the Declaratory Judgments Act, the Court did not reach any conclusion its August 13, 2024 Order. At that time, the Court stated that the issue "may be explored and argued after trial, should Plaintiffs prevail in establishing liability." Aug. 13, 2024 Order, at 15. Plaintiffs have now prevailed in establishing liability, and the Court believes that Avangrid Networks, Inc. v. Sec'y of State, 2020 ME 109, 237 A.3d 882 offers a sound alternative for the parties and the Court. The case involved the dispute over the citizen ballot initiative against the Central Maine Power transmission line from Quebec to Lewiston, Maine. In that case, the Law Court "saw no need to" order injunctive relief enjoining the Secretary of State from including the initiative on the ballot because the Secretary of State had represented to the Law Court that, if the Court were to conclude that the ballot initiative was unconstitutional, he would not include the initiative on the ballot. Id. ¶ 39. The Law Court was "confident that he '[would] comply with the law once it is declared' and prevent the invalid initiative from being placed on the ballot," and thus declined to order the injunctive relief requested by plaintiffs. Id. (quoting Great N. Paper, Inc. v. Penobscot Nation, 2001 ME 68, ¶ 64 n.21, 770 A.2d 574).[17]

Counsel for the State has represented to this Court on multiple occasions that the State would step into the shoes of MCPDS for any violations found by this Court. Now that the Court has found liability against the MCPDS Defendants, and after review of the Avangrid decision, the Court thinks it appropriate for the State to advise the Court as to whether the State will indeed step up and support the agency in providing a remedy for the violations found.

Counsel for the State has ten days to respond to the Court's inquiry. If the State stands by its Counsel's previous statements to the Court, it will become "unnecessary" for this Court to consider or resolve the complex issues of first impression as to the injunctive relief requested by Plaintiffs. See Avangrid, 2020 ME 109, ¶ 39, 237 A.3d 882; see also Gideon v. Wainwright, 372

[17] The Law Court's discussion of this issue reads in full:

> As we have noted, in the trial court and indeed during much of his oral argument on this appeal, the Secretary of State has opposed the issuance of injunctive relief that would enjoin him from including the initiative on the ballot. Ultimately, however, counsel for the Secretary stated that if we were to conclude that the initiative is unconstitutional and cannot be submitted to the electors for popular vote—which is precisely our clear holding today—on his own accord, he will not include the initiative on the ballot. Based on the Secretary of State's clarification of his position, we are confident that he "will comply with the law once it is declared" and prevent the invalid initiative from being placed on the ballot. Great N. Paper, Inc. v. Penobscot Nation, 2001 ME 68, ¶ 64 n.21, 770 A.2d 574. Thus, we see no need for the issuance of injunctive relief. See Littlefield v. Town of Lyman, 447 A.2d 1231, 1235 (Me. 1982) (holding that injunctive relief against a municipal planning board was "unnecessary" when we remanded for the trial court to enter a declaratory judgment that a specific version of an ordinance applied and there was "no evidence suggesting an unwillingness on the part of the Board to accept a judicial determination of that question").

Avangrid, 2020 ME 109, ¶ 39, 237 A.3d 882.

U.S. 335, 343 (1963) ("[O]ne charged with crime, who is unable to obtain counsel, must be furnished counsel by the state." (emphasis added)).

The Court will wait for Counsel's response before issuing any further order on Count V.

The entry will be:

On Count I, the Court orders a permanent injunction requiring MCPDS Defendants to provide continuous representation for Plaintiffs. The Court further orders them to provide a plan to the Court explaining how they will comply with the injunction. The deadlines for providing representation and for filing the plan with the Court are set forth on pp. 23–24 and are incorporated herein.

On Count III, the Court will provide Habeas Corpus relief for Plaintiffs as set forth in detail on pp. 34–40. The deadlines and procedures established on pp. 40–42 are incorporated herein.

Counsel of record for Counts I, III, and V, along with Counsel for Maine county sheriffs in Count III, shall attend a hearing on April 7, 2025 at 10:00 a.m. at the Capital Judicial Center. Any attorney for the sheriffs may appear remotely.

On Count V, the Court defers ruling on pending motion for summary judgment brought by the State of Maine until the Court receives the State's response to the inquiry made by the Court on pp. 44 of this Order.

The Clerk shall note this Order on the docket by reference pursuant to Rule 79(a) of the Maine Rules of Civil Procedure.
